The University of Melbourne

Lachlan is a PhD candidate in the Arndt-Corden Department of Economics, ANU. His research interests cover immigration, firms and labour markets, in particular focusing on the link between immigration and firm-level productivity in Australia.

Lachlan has over 10 years public policy experience, working at the intersection of economics, data and policy. This includes experience in applied microeconometrics, causal inference, and the analysis of large administrative datasets.

He previously worked at the Australian Treasury, across social policy, financial policy, and microdata research, as well as in the United Kingdom at the Financial Conduct Authority where he led microdata research and ex-post impact evaluations. He is currently on leave from the e61 Institute, where he led research investigating the observed structural slowdown of Australia's economy.

Through his policy work Lachlan has published research and analysis on the labour market and related programs (including JobKeeper), financial market policies and shocks, and immigration.

Lachlan holds a Bachelor of Commerce (Economics) (Hons) from the University of Melbourne.
